WHY START THE RECRUITING PROCESS EARLY

BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF THE PROCESS

When you have more time to ask questions and gain knowledge about rules and college sports, you will ultimately have a better understanding of the recruiting process. Each new piece of knowledge gives you the opportunity to better assist your child on this journey.

BETTER DECISION-MAKING

The more time you give yourselves, the better decision-making you'll create. You will have more time to really contemplate what's important.

LESS PRESSURE

Pressures come in different forms throughout the recruiting journey. With more time to digest these situations, the easier they are to handle. There is an increased risk of making mistakes when you have to rush.

MORE IN-DEPTH RESEARCH

Begin to form a "working list" of what is important to your daughter at a young age. You can then begin to look into some of them. As you go through the process, and as she learns more about her wants and needs, the list will change. Starting earlier will help her discover those things before its too late.

TACKLING SMALLER CHUNKS

The recruiting process is a large and overwhelming entity. You and your child need time to process all the information, choices, opportunities and decisions. Starting early in her high school career allows you more time to digest it in smaller, doable pieces.

ALLOWING MORE VISITS

Taking multiple visits to colleges is an advantage. Every time you step on a campus, you learn something. The more information you have about each and every college, the better the chance of making a successful choice. One visit may not be enough.

BETTER CHANCE OF A SUCCESSFUL CHOICE

The bottom line is you don't have to wait. You can pursue this journey with your daughter on your own, whenever you are ready. Give yourselves the time to make a good choice. It will make all the difference.
